W. L. Allen's Letter. London is slowly adopting the continental practice of putting tablets on houses in which great men have lived. We are soon to have a tablet on the house 122 Great Portland street, setting forth the fact that James Boswell died somewhere thereabouts. The tablet was originally intended to make the mendacious, though well-meaning statement, that Boswell died in that particular house, but as the house was built many years after Boswell's death, he would have found difficulty in dying in it. So the tablet is now to inform us that Boswell died in a house formerly situated on the site of the present house. This seems to be carrying the idea to an extreme. It is all very well to place them on houses in which great men have been born or have lived or died. but to place them on houses built yesterday and never so much as dreamed of by the men whom the tablets are designed to honor seems rather foolish. It reminds one of the ancient story of the exhibitor

Do Children Lief

the ass.

who showed the sword that Balaam wished for when he held his famous debate with

New York Tribune. Do children lie? Yes; constantly, per-sistently and universally, says the Kinder-garten Magazine. A child does not tell the truth because he could not. He does not know the truth, and his approximation to the truth is very much vaguer than ours And there are certain qualities of his mine which make it inevitable that he should pervert the truth. In the first place, truth is synonymous with knowledge. He does not know what truth is. In the second place (and it is the same with us), children gradually approximate the truth. In the third place, the child's imagination drives him often to tell what is not true.
